

DOUBT

Ever had that feeling —
this may fail someday,
this may come back to me —
and you can't shake it?

When doubt whispers, listen before it fades.

Doubt is the quietest alarm you'll ever hear.

Doubt

Ever had that feeling — this may fail someday, this may come back to me — and you can't shake it? That's doubt. Listen to it. It's trying to tell you something.

Every decision, every risk assessment, every PHA carries a flicker of doubt that something might've been missed. That feeling isn't weakness — it's awareness. It's the signal before the silence, the quietest alarm you'll ever hear.

The new book under construction, RiskAlive.com, explores how doubt can be transformed into validation and shared learning — how data can help confirm what our instincts already suspect. NEW (coming... on every PHA, risk assessment, to check against what others have considered to be risk, what incidents, near misses, others may have incurred, any woops missing and or inconsistencies) Until then, a recent book, The Soul of Risk offers a first glimpse of what it means to live with doubt: to feel it, question it, and be guided by it. Written for young professionals and undergraduates, it's a way to understand how uncertainty can sharpen our sense of truth.

Because when doubt rings — about a family member, an unsafe day, an audit, a lawsuit, or a quiet unease — that's life giving you a warning call. The human kind. The one that won't always come twice. Most harm and regret begin with ignored doubt. The moment passed. The voice was faint. And we told ourselves we'd check it later.

So, when doubt creeps in — about your decision, your assessment, your priorities — don't bury it. Bring it forward. It may be the last time you hear it before consequence arrives. Let Risk Alive help you see if your hesitation was right all along.

To doubt is human. To validate and confirm — that's what makes us complete, trustworthy, and safe.

With gratitude,
Ken
